Draft Brood Mares.

The first thing which the farmer sketches of the Boer war for Ameri- and future horse breader must select can newspapers. He was riding to is his brood marcs. These should be ward a kopie one morning when the | selected primarily from the standpoint audden sound of heavy firing sent the sf their being able to do the work reblood flying to his heart, as he realized | quired of them. It would be a mistake that beyond the brow were the Boers to select heavy druft mares for some and that an engagement was taking of the rough hill or mountain farms and a greater mistake to try to do the work on comparatively level farms with light mares. Horse power is cheaper than man power.

Maternity rather than beauty should also be kept in view. The best looking mare is seldom the bost breeder. The brood mare should have a roomy, somewhat loose construction rather than the compact, closely knit form, which is more attractive to the eye. It is a general rule of breeding that compactness should be sought in the male, size in the female. A partial exception to this rule is in the production of draft horses on the farm. Excessively heavy mares would be unwieldy for general farm work. Therefore size is sought in the stallion, and mares are chosen which are not too large to be profitable workers, but large enough to mute consistently with the stallion selected .- Professor Thomus 1. Mairs Before Pennsylvania Normai Institute.

Color in Draft Horses.

This important matter is certainly too little considered. It is all moonshine to say that a good horse is never of a bad color, and the old saw has done harm enough and to spare. The fady colored equine may possibly be able to do as hard a day's work as the but it very likely may not. Fady colors and delicate constitution go together very often, while such shades or blazing marks are never admired by the buyer. The dealer will not be long telling you about it if you have a fady chestnut, a piebaid, light gray or cream colored horse to sell, and certainly those firms that pay high figures for their heavy horses will not countsnauce bad colors. Then upon the principle of holding every feature up to top quality and missing no advantage cullar colored mares. How many of the most promising fillies which will make the best brood mares are sold just because they bring in a little extra money, while the inferior ones are kept to become brood mares!-W. R. Gilbert in National Stockman.
